Quaff-er, s. One that quaffs: with little apparent allusion to its proper meaning, it is used by Derham as a verb to signify the act of groping for food in the water, as a duck.

QUAGGY, kwäg'-güé, 188, 142, 77: a. Trembling under the feet, as soft wet earth.

Quag'-mire, s. A shaking marsh or bog that just bears, but trembles under the feet.

To Quag'-mire, v. a. To whelm as in a quagmire.

QUAID.—See the next word.

To QUAIL, kwäil, 188: v. n. and a. To sink in spirit, to be dejected:—act. To cast down, to quell, to depress, to sink: the active sense seldom occurs at present, but is frequent in our old poets: Spenser in one place uses quail for the participle, joining it as is supposed, merely for a rhyme: To quail seems once to have been used in the sense of To Coagulate, as "To quail milk."

Quail'ing, s. State of failing in spirit.

QUAIL, kwäil, s. A bird of game.

Quail'-pipe, s. Pipe to allure quails.

QUAINT, kwäint, a. Nice, dainty, curious; exact with petty elegance; odd through nicety; in old authors, unusual, wonderful; in Chaucer it sometimes means subtle, artful: Shakespeare often uses it as a term of praise for neat, pretty, exact; and Milton, as well as Shakespeare, for fine-spun or subtle with regard to thought or language: Swift applies it to what is affected or foppish, which is a departure from the original notion.

Quaint'-ly, ad. In a quaint manner.

Quaint'-ness, s. The quality of being quaint.

To QUAKE, kwäke, 188: v. n. and a. To shake; to tremble with fear or cold; not to be solid or firm:—act. [Shaks.] To throw into a quaking. The Obs. pret. is quook.

Quake, s. A shake, a trembling.

Qua'-king, s. Trepidation.

QUA'-KER, s. One that quakes: it is applied at present, without any remnant of its original meaning, to one of a sect of Christians who call themselves "Friends:" the name was given in derision, because George Fox, their founder, told a justice of peace to tremble at the word of the Lord: in religious doctrine the Quakers are remarkable for their regard to the influences of the spirit; in practice, for simplicity of manners and apparel.

Qua'-ker-ly, a. Resembling Quakers.

Qua'-ker-ism, 158: s. The religious notions, or plain dress and manners, of Quakers: Qua'kery is less used.

To QUALIFY, kwöl'-ë-fy, 188, 140, 105, 6: v. a. To fit for any thing; to make capable of any employment; to modify or regulate the quality of; hence, to abate, to soften, to usage.

Qual'-i-fi-er, s. He or that which qualifies.

Qual'-i-fi-a-ble, a. That may be qualified.

To Quan-da-ry, v. a. To bring into difficulty.

QUANTITATIVE.—See in the next class.

QUANTITY, kwön-té-té, 188, 168, 105: s. That property of any thing which may be increased or diminished; any indeterminate weight or measure, bulk or weight; a portion; sometimes distinctively a large portion; the time of a syllable in utterance; in the dead languages, the time of a syllable as it used to be when the language was nationally spoken.

Quan'-ti-tive, 105: a. Quantitative. [Digby.]

Quan'-ti-ta-tive, a. Estimable according to quantity.

Quan'-tum, [Lat.] s. The quantity, the amount

QUARANTINE, kwör'-än-tén, 188, 140, 129, 104: s. The space of forty days; also spelled Carantane and Quarantain: it is applied, specially, to the season of Lent; to the space, whether forty days or not, during which a ship suspected of infection is obliged to forbear intercourse or commerce; and to the privilege which a widow, whose husband dies seized of land, may claim of continuing in his capital message (so it be not a castle) for forty days after his decease.

To Quar'-an-tine, v. a. To prohibit from intercourse with a city or its inhabitants.

QUARRE.—See Quarry.

QUARREL, kwör'-rél, 188, 140, 129, 14: s. A brawl, a dispute; a cause of dispute; something that gives right to any angry reprisal; objection, ill-will; in Shakespeare it sometimes means a quarrelsome person: the word has other senses from another etymology, for which see it under QUARRY, a square.

To Quar'-rel, v. n. and a. To dispute violently, or with loud and angry words; to fall into variance; to fight; to find fault; to disagree:—act. [Harsh or obs.] To quarrel with; to compel by a quarrel.

Quar'-rel-ler, s. One that quarrels.

R.

R is popularly the seventeenth letter of the alphabet, though really the eighteenth; see J: it has a rough or genuine consonant sound at the beginning of words and syllables, being the 3rd element of the schemes pre-fixed; but following a vowel in the same syllable, and not coming before a vowel in the next word or syllable, it has not, in polished metropolitan utterance, a forcible consonant sound, but merely gives guttural vibration, length, and frequently broadness, to the previous vowel; see the scheme of vowels from element 33 to 54, inclusive. The letters rh are a digraph simply equivalent to r: see 164. As an abbreviation, R. stands for Rex. (King); for Royal, as R. N. (Royal Navy); R. A. (Royal Academician); R. M. (Royal Marines); which last also stand for Ready Money.

REASON, rě-zn, 103, 151, 114: s. That capacity in man by which, when two things are mentally suggested, he understands them relatively, and in this manner has a notion or knowledge of them over and above the mere suggestions, and with this further power, that each notion so gained becomes a step to further knowledge; or to the same purpose, but with reference to the difference between man and the inferior animals, it may otherwise be defined the power of abstraction, or of perceiving what is common to two or more things, and so of acquiring motives of action distinct from appetite alone, or instinct, or habit; it is a passive, not an active power,—our will, while we are awake and while our faculties are healthy, lying over other parts of our nature, (see Thinking), but never over our reason, which cannot, if it understand at all, but understand in one way: it is not acquirable, and it can no otherwise be assisted than by the suggestions sought for or presented: in some degree it is inherent in every man not being entirely an idiot; but in different men its force varies, and in the same individual it is not equal in force with respect to all suggestions, one man having a quick understanding of the relations of quantity, but not of quality, or of some kinds of quality, but not of others; and vice versa: in itself, as an ultimate principle of our nature, it is never erroneous; what we call wrong conclusions, being conclusions obtained by some artificial process taking the place of reason, (as an arithmetical calculation wrongly worked by a rule learned implicitly, or a conclusion obtained by the extremes and means of an Aristotelian syllogism when the rules of the art are unwarily violated,) or they are conclusions just in themselves, and wrong only as regards the assumptions or suggestions out of which they arise: it is a power which may however be lost, but the loss is idiotcy, not madness; the madman continues to reason, but because of the distemper or disorganization, original or superinduced, of other parts of his nature, (a depravation not always of the head only, not of the imagination alone, but often of the appetites and affections, or what we call the heart;) he is incapable of reasoning to a wholesome end: with regard to the idiot, his case is different; he does not reason at all, and we properly say he understands not, because he has no understanding, or because he has lost it:—ground or principle; cause efficient; cause final; argument; motive; ratiocination; just account; just view of things; conduct such as the state of things requires.

To Rea-son, v. n. and a. To apply the faculty of reason in order to understand something; to discourse with another in order to make him understand something by adducing premises, and connecting their consequences; to debate:—act. To examine rationally.

S is popularly the eighteenth letter of the alphabet, though really the nineteenth : see J : its proper sound is the 55th element of the schemes prefixed ; but, except at the beginning of words, this hissing is more frequently converted into another element than actually sounded ; and the charge of a sibilant pronunciation more justly attaches to a defective utterance of the language than to the language itself when uttered according to metropolitan usage of the present day. Even at the beginning of words the s is not always sibilant, but with h forms a digraph which is the regular indication of the 61st element. In the middle and at the end of words it is very often vocalized, or converted into the 60th element : see Prin. 137, 143, 151, 158 : and in many situations the sibilant or the vocalized sound deviates into the 61st, 62d, 63d, or 64th element : see Prin. 147. As an abbreviation, S stands for Socius, (followed) : Societas or Societatis, (Society) : Solidus or Solidi, (a shilling or shillings) : South, &c.

SCIENCE=sî'-ênca, 59: s. That which we know: hence it may comprehend all we learn by whatever means; but it generally refers to truth attained by a course of methodical study; and, first, it means that which we know deductively, that is, by such exercise of the intellect as makes us perceive the truths attained to be necessarily included in or constituted by the admissions or assumptions with which we start; this, by preeminence, is often deemed science, so as to exclude from the term all other science: but, secondly, it often means that which we know inductively or by the experience of particulars, from which we ascend to general conclusions not necessarily constituted by those particulars, yet warranted by previous experience, and by analogies widely observed: science which agrees with the latter description is physical, moral, or practical; physical is that which is susceptible of experiment, and is therefore said to be founded on experimental evidence; moral is that which, lying in great part beyond the reach of experiment, rests for its certainty on aggregated facts supported by concurrent testimony, by experience, and by analogy, so as to leave no room for doubt, though not demonstrable; and practical is that which consists of general observations arising out of experience, and is otherwise called theory in correlation to an art or practice always belonging to it, and, indeed, preceding it, though the theory is afterwards instrumental to the perfection of the practice: with a very obscure observance of the foregoing distinctions, the seven sciences of antiquity are grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy.

SEM'-A-TOL'-O-GY, 87: s. The doctrine of the use of signs, particularly of verbal signs, in the operations of thinking and reasoning, comprehending the theory of Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric.

A term in single use ought not, perhaps, to be inserted among the authorized words of a language; yet this is introduced for the sake of a remark on the pronunciation here assigned to it. The compounder of the word, recollecting the long e in the Greek word sema, had accustomed himself to say Sem'-atol'-ogy; but while his treatise was going through the press, he observed that Mr. Woodfall's men, from the devil up to the reader, called it Sem'-atol'-ogy; and to a tendency of our language so plainly indicated (see Prin. 92) he feels himself bound, as a teacher of English, to yield his little piece of Greek foppery, as an example of self-denial to those whose Greek or Latin is in higher repute, and who have, therefore, less occasion than himself to exhibit an end of it every now and then through a button-hole. Someotics, see in Supp.

SENOCLAR.—See under Senary.

SENSATED, SENSATION.—See in the next class.

SENSE=sĕnce, 153: s. The first or lowest capacity of the mind, that by which corporal impressions are felt; the organs of this capacity in man being reckoned five—the eyes, the ears, the fingers, the nose, and the palate or tongue; in correspondence with which the five senses are sight, hearing, touch, smell, and taste; in this distribution the touch is not made sufficiently comprehensive; for not only are the fingers organs of touch, but every part of the body; and not only do sensations arise from the contact of other bodies, but from affections of the nerves and muscles when no perceptible contact occurs; indeed if we include as belonging to touch all the sensations which cannot be assigned to the other senses, it is by far the most comprehensive of the five; and even the other four are but particular modes of contact or touch; note, that the capacity of sensation does not necessarily include perception, although in most brute animals it is instinctively linked with it, and in man the same union is gradually formed by the operation of reason and the force of habitual association; (see Perception;) still there always remain cases in which sensation is unaccompanied by any thing except the consciousness of it; and even the consciousness under some circumstances may be wanting: (see Consciousness.) The word sense is also used, secondly, to signify susceptibility of emotion, a capacity generally or popularly ascribed to the heart, or designated by the word soul; and thirdly, to signify the intellectual understanding, or power of judgement; for both which are lower in the class with the related words in each application.

Sen-sa'-tion, 89: s. The effect produced on the sensorium by something acting on the bodily organs.

SHAKEN, shă'-kn, 114: } tion; to make to totter or tremble; to throw down, from, off, with or without the qualifying particles; to weaken; to make afraid:—

neu. To be agitated; to totter; to tremble: To shake hands is often used, not literally, but figuratively, in the sense of to take leave; often in that of to join.

Shake, s. Concussion suffered; impulse; vibratory motion; junction and motion of hands; a lengthened trill with two notes.

Sha'-ker, s. He or that which shakes; one of a sect

in America, so called from the agitation or movements

I SHALL=shăl, 112: } v. n. I intend to;

I SHOULD, shôod, 127: } I am in a state to;

in the second and third persons, must.

Shall is the proper sign of the future tense in our language, and will usurps its place only to prevent ambiguity. When a speaker says "I shall die," he means that the event is to occur by the course of nature; when he says "I shall go," he means either an outward compulsion through which he shall go, or his own will through which he shall go; thus there is a doubt attached to the latter phrase, but a doubt of little moment, or easily solved by the context; in the second or third person, if a speaker were to use shall with similar intentions, and say "Thou shalt die,"

"He shall go," we should be liable to interpret his meaning not as a declaration of what is to take place by the course of nature, or the will of him who is the subject of the verb, but of what is to ensue by the will of the speaker, which would not be a simple future, but a threat or a promise; and it is to prevent this misinterpretation that in the second and third persons we indicate the simple future by will instead of shall; as, I shall go, thou wilt go, he will go; we shall go, you will go, they will go; but this form generally gives way when the cause that produced it no longer requires the anomaly, shall resuming its office as the indication of simple futurity even in the second and third persons, when the context or some transposition guarantees no more than its intended effect; e. g. "Shall you go?" "He thinks that he shall go."

SHALL=shăl, 105: ad. Shall I, or shall I not?

To stand shillishalli is to stand hesitating.

SHALLOON=shăl'-lōon', s. A slight woollen stuff, originally made at Châlons.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

spirit from; to raise by distillation; to purify from the feculence of the world; to convert to a spiritual meaning.

Spir'-it-u-al-ist, s. One who professes a regard to spiritual things; one whose profession is spiritual; also, one who admits the reality of an intelligent being, distinct from the perceptible universe: this definition includes all who are not materialists; (see Materialist.) Spiritualists, however, with respect to the human mind or soul, seem to hold different opinions, so as to bring them under the different denominations of Platonists and Anti-Platonists: the Platonists believe the soul to be quite distinct from the body, in such a manner that death is the literal separation of one from the other, the one continuing to exist as mere matter, the other as an intelligent being whose substance is intelligence or intellectuality merely: the Anti-Platonists deem mind or soul to be nothing more than a name for the capabilities of sensation, perception, and thought, with which man is endowed simply in consequence of his Maker's will; that these capabilities cease at death as motion ceases in a rolling ball when it comes to a state of rest; and consequently that a future state of existence is not the existence of the soul separately from the body, which is the doctrine of the pure Platonists; nor of the re-union of the soul with the body after the former has for a while existed separately, which is the opinion perhaps of the majority of Christians, but is the raising of the body, through the power of the Creator, under new circumstances of existence, a spiritual body from that which was a material body, and this is the opinion of the Anti-Platonists among Christians.

Spir'-it-u-ous, a. Having tenacity and activity of parts; lively, airy, vivid; ardent, inflammable, as Spirituous liquors. Spirituous liquors would perhaps be better; yet Spirituous is more usual in this application.

Spir'-it-u-ous-ness, s. The quality of being spirituous. Spir'-it-u-ous-ness is not in use. See other related words, &c. To SPIRT=spert, 35: v. n. and a. To spring or stream out, as a fluid, suddenly, or at intervals:—act. To throw out in a jet.

SUB, A Latin preposition signifying under, below, which occurs as a prefix in the greater part of the following words, in most of which it implies a subordinate degree, or some degree, sometimes the least possible degree of that which the rest of the word expresses. Some of the words which commence with the letters are not, however, compounded with the preposition; and many others occur which, though originally compounded with it, have lost their compound character: these will be distinguished from the obvious compounds, and also from words which, though not obvious compounds, seldom occur. It should be further noted that the last letter in this prefix, as in many others, is often changed into the letter which begins the next syllable, as in succumb, suggest, suffer, summon, suppose. See other compounds in Supp.

SUB-JUNC'-TIVE, 105: a. Subjoined to something.

Sub-junc'-tive-mood', or Sub-junc'-tive, s. A form of a verb which fits it for being subjoined actually or virtually to another verb. This mood in the English language, if limited to the specific forms which have arisen out of a subjunctive use of verbs, extends only to two tenses of the verb To be, and only to one tense of all other verbs; these forms are as follow: If I be; if thou be; if he be; if we be, &c. If I love; if thou wert; if he were; if we were, &c. If I love; if thou love; if he love; if we love, &c. The practical rule for using these, or the correspondent indicative forms, is as follows: In employing the present tense, (so called not from its uniform meaning, but from the absence of the preterit sign or inflection,) if the time meant should really be future, then use the subjunctive form, but otherwise the indicative; and in employing what is called the past tense, if the time meant should really be present, then also use the subjunctive form, but otherwise the indicative: Thus as to the present tense (so called) we must say, "If I be there to-morrow, I will tell him." "If she love me when we shall be married, it will be all I expect." And thus as to the past tense (so called) we must say, "If I were there at this moment, I should be happy." On the other hand we must use the indicative forms in cases corresponding to the following: "If I am here, it is more than I expected or promised." "If she loves me as she says she does, why does she refuse me?" "If I was there last year, I have quite forgotten it."

For Syllabus see Syllabus.

Syl'-LA-BUS, s. That which takes or unites the whole,—an abstract, compendium, or view at once.

Syl'-lēr'-sis, s. A figure by which we determine the construction of a sentence by the meaning rather than by the strictness of grammar, as in saying "I and he are friends," we take all the nominatives together and consider them of the first person, though he and friends are strictly of the third.

SYLLOGISM, sīl'-lō-gīzm, 158: s. (See Syn.)

A discourse of which the joint parts denote one act of reasoning,—a form of language expressing a necessary consequence by three propositions, as, "Every man is mad: Horace is a man: Therefore Horace is mad." It is universally admitted that this is the strongest mode in which a necessary consequence of some previous admission can be stated; but as to any further virtue in the syllogism, the Aristotelians and the Lockists, as they may severally be called, hold different opinions. The former are not satisfied with this admission in favour of the syllogism, but they farther propose it as an instrument by which to prove the legitimacy of the consequence; and, for this end, they accept the apparatus of middle and extreme terms, and of propositions differentiated by quantity and quality, and of syllogisms reduced to moods and figures, as invented by Aristotle and maintained and used by the schoolmen. The Lockist, on the other hand, rejects the whole of this apparatus as an imposition on the understanding, maintaining that a necessary consequence admits of no proof beyond the statement of the premises that exhibit it,—that to understand these premises is to understand the conclusion contained in them,—that the act of mind by which it so understands is an ultimate principle of our nature, admitting of no explanation, of no reduction into any more general principle, of no further proof, and that every attempt at such explanation, or reduction, or proof, is either a repetition of the act already completed,—a proof of what has been proved—or, if the truth sought to be established is not already evident, the syllogism is an absurd attempt to do that by a mechanical process which, in a plainer form, the understanding has been unable to compass.

To Syl'-lō-gize, v. n. To reason by syllogism.

Syl'-lō-gi'-zer, s. One who syllogizes.

Syl'-lō-gi-za'-tion, s. Act of syllogizing. [Harris.]

THING=thîng, s. Whatever is distinct, or conceived to be distinct, from one's self and from other intelligent beings: it is used of persons only in contempt; it is sometimes used in contempt though not of persons.

To THINK, thînk, 158 : v. n. and a. To have I Thought, thâwt, 126 : a succession of intel-

Thought, thâwt, 162 : a lectual states which are conceived to be distinct from the mind itself, though not really so; to cogitate; to imagine; to reason; to judge; to determine; to intend; to meditate; to recollect; to consider;—act. To conceive; to imagine; to believe; to esteem: To think on, to contrive; to light upon by meditation: To think of, to estimate: To think much, to grudge: To think scorn, to disdain: Methinks or Methinketh, Methought, are forms which exhibit the relationship of the noun at the head of the class to the verb; they literally signify the operation of things on me, and are equivalent to I think, or I thought.

Think'-er, s. One who thinks in a certain manner.

Think'-ing, s. That series of intellectual states which a man is conscious of when he controls and directs the series. It is to be observed that no man can positively will the intellectual state (or thought as it is called) which shall succeed the actual state; for this implies that the state desired is already present to the will. What we can do is this: we can dwell upon or rest in a present state, till, of the multitude of states connected with it by previous habits, one arises to suit the present purpose, other states (or thoughts as they are called) having been dismissed as fast as they arose, and in thus controlling or directing the states of the intellect, we can assist ourselves most materially by signs of abstract notions, which we form and establish for the double purpose of fixing or limiting any present state, and of using as instruments in the further operations of our understanding. Such is the control or power of direction which in a healthy and waking state we can exert over the intellectual part of our nature—a control which we can at pleasure relax, or altogether remit. In this last case, namely, the entire remission of control, although we do not cease to have thoughts or states of intellect, yet we cannot in the same emphatic sense be said to think. He who suffers his mind to take no other states than those which external objects suggest, may, if we had such a verb, be said to be thînged, rather than to think; while he who wholly withdraws himself from the influence of such suggestions, yet exerts no control over the states that spontaneously arise, can with as little propriety be said to think; he is dreaming though awake,—a peculiar condition always known by the vacant expression of the eyes, and properly designated by the word reverie. Between this and the dream of sleep there is this difference, that in the latter, not only do we exert no control over our mental states, but while sleep continues, we are incapable of such control, and the series is in general much more incoherent than in reverie. Of the states which thus arise when no control is exerted, it must not however be deemed that they are independent of previous and present causes. None can arise but such states as have already had entertainment, or by association are linked with them; and of these the accidental condition of the animal parts of our nature will probably determine the character of the series. So strong are these causes, that they may at last become predominant over the individual in his wakeful state,—that is to say, a particular train or character of thought may, by long indulgence, or by the disorganization of the body, or by the mutual influence and joint power of both these causes, become at last uncontrollable, as to form, with partial effect, monomania,—with wider devastation, mania. And as, in all cases, the states which arise depend on the previous habits of the individual, so it may be, even where the power of control is not lost, that, as far as regards the individual himself, he can summon no thought which shall not be evil or suggest evil: this is a possible condition not of one man only, but of a multitude of men, and hence we may credit the vivid description of the old world, when "every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart" is said to have been "only evil continually."

THOUGHT, s. Any state of consciousness which is more than mere sensation; also, the outward expression of such a state, of power to produce a similar state in other persons, and to revive it at any future time either in them or in the person who first conceived it: in this second sense, a thought is a creation of the mind having distinct existence from the mind that created it; nothing can be more erroneous than to assume these as conditions of thought in the first sense, and yet no assumption is more common and more general; to the same twofold meaning, and to the same wrong assumption when the former meaning is in view, are the paronymous words liable, such as idea, image, formed in the mind; sentiment, fancy, imagery, conceit; reflection, particular consideration; conception; notion; opinion; judgement; meditation; design; solicitude; expectation: in an application colloquial and rather loose, thought is used to signify a small degree or quantity, as, "I am a thought better than I was."

Thought'-ful, 117 : a. Full of thought, attentive; promoting serious thought; anxious.

Thought'-ful-ly, ad. With thought; with care.

U.

U, which in most dictionaries is confounded with V, although in sound no letters can be more distinct, is popularly the twentieth letter of the alphabet, though really the twenty-first: see J: its sounds are the 24, 10th, 19th, 20th, 39th, 40th, 49th, and 50th etern-ets of the schemes prefixed: its alphabetic sound, though passing for a vowel, includes also a consonant; (see Prin. 9.) but in combination this sound often becomes oo: (see Prin. 109.) With o prefixed it forms a digraph properly for the 31st and 32d elements, but liable to be variously sounded: (see Prin. 125.) As an abbreviation it occurs in the dates of Roman annals; thus U. C. 500 mean Urbe Condita 500, or the city having been built 500 years: U. is an abbreviation of Ultima, "in the last" — month understood.

UN-, A Saxon prefix equivalent to the privative A- in Greek derivatives, and to Ja- when used as a privative in words from Latin and French. In adjectives it is uniformly interpretable by not, in substantives by want or absence of; and in verbs (and consequently in their passive participles, which are hence liable to two meanings) it almost always signifies the reversing or annulling of the action or state expressed by the verb. Before passive participles it is used spontaneously to form adjectives, and every adjective so formed is legitimate, though no example of its previous use may be found. It is employed almost with the same freedom to give a negative meaning to established adjectives; but this liberty may be carried too far, and some of the compounds thus formed by our old writers will scarcely bear imitation in modern style. Compounds formed with adjectives coined for the purpose of being joined with it, are still more unsafe to be copied, though with modern authority to back them: (See Unalmsed.) It is further observable, that many compounds which in old writings are formed with Un, modern style prefers to form with Ja, though the latter prefix is far more ambiguous: (See In-.) The general rule seems to be, that Un should be used before Saxon adjectives, but Ja before those of decidedly classical affinity: thus we say Unbecoming, but Indecorous; yet many compounds of Un with adjectives of Latin parentage are established, as Ungracious. It will be unnecessary, as indeed it would be almost endless, to give all the words that may legitimately be formed with Un: the object in those that follow is to furnish a sufficient specimen of such as may be used, and to distinguish quaint, obsolete, or unusual compounds by the authors' names of best authority who use them.

UNABLE, ūn-ā'-bl, 101: a. (See Un-.) Not able, weak.

Un-a'-ble-ness, s. Inability: for this last word Milton's prose gives Unability, which is disused.

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mīsh-ūn, i. e. mission, 165: vīzh-ūn, i. e. vision, 165: shēn, 166.

V.

V has usually been confounded with U; and because J was in like manner confounded with I, it is popularly deemed the twentieth letter of the alphabet, though of the English alphabet it is really the twenty-second. In the ancient pronunciation of Latin, U and V had no other difference than that which converted su-a'-e-is, pronounced soo-ä'-vis, into sua'-nis, pronounced swä'-vis, the original pronunciation of V being that of the English consonant v, (Element 57:) hence, though the former was deemed a vowel, and the latter a consonant sound, yet the ease with which they were mutually convertible, justified the distribution that assigned only one place in the alphabet to the two letters; while the absurdity of continuing this distribution now that the letters denote sounds completely distinct, cannot but be obvious. V, at present, is related not to u, but to f. The Saxon probably made their f sometimes aspirate, sometimes vocal, as they did their th: we continue to vocalize th in the greater number of Saxon words, and we vocalize f in of; but for this last sound, in all other instances, v is now the appropriated mark, so that it has completely changed its office and character; and this is the case not only in our own language, where its appropriation to another element is justifiable, since we have invented w for its original sound, but equally in our pronunciation of Latin, where its new sound, however established by custom, is obviously incorrect. The present sound of V is the 66th element of the schemes prefixed. In abbreviations of ancient inscription, as in all ancient writing, V must be understood as a U: in modern abbreviations it stands for Verbum or Verbi, (a word or expression;) Vir, (a man;) and Vide, (see;) while Viz., or V. L., stand for Vide licet, (to wit, or namely.)

different forms of the same letter, are now properly deemed four distinct letters. Originally, indeed, the sound of J with respect to I, and of V with respect to U, were nothing more than organic actions on the bases of the purely vowel sounds; but for the organic action or consonant element denoted formerly by J, we now use Y initial, diverting J to a different and distinct purpose, (see J); and so likewise, having diverted V from its original use, (see V), we now employ V doubled, that is VV or W initial, in order to serve the office formerly belonging to V simple; accordingly, the letter W, at the beginning of words and syllables, denotes the 57th element of the schemes prefixed: see Prins. 57 and 145. As a vowel letter, W is but another form of U.

To WABBLE, wōb'-bl, 140, 101: v. n. To move from one side to the other, as a spinning top when about to fall.

ficant or light as wind: To gaden the wind, to decay:
To take or have the wind, to have the advantage.

To Wind, v. a. (verb reg.) To ventilate; to perceive or follow by the wind or scent; to ride or drive [a horse] so as to render scent of wind; to rest [a horse] in order to recover wind; to sound by inflation, as "To Wind a horn:" so might the sense be interpreted while this verb followed the old pronunciation of the substantive,—namely, Wînd; but the present notion of winding a horn is that which Milton has when speaking of "a winding bout of linked sweetness:"
with which notion the interpretation given of this application of the verb in the previous class agrees.

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

WIT, s. The mental powers collectively, the intellect, the understanding; sense, judgement; faculty of the mind, singly, whence the phrase to lose one's wit: these are the old senses of the word, according to which a man of wit would signify a man of judgement or understanding:—imagination; the power of original combination under the influence of imagination; according to which sense, a man of wit, or a wit, is a man of brilliant fancy, a man of genius; and this, as applied to persons, is the meaning of the word with writers of the last century, and a little earlier:—at present, as designating a power of mind, the word is mostly restricted to that particular exercise of wit which perceives or exhibits ludicrous points of analogy or resemblance among things in other respects completely dissimilar; and by a man of wit, or a wit, is understood a man in whom a readiness for such exercise of the mind is remarkable: it is a talent not necessarily joined with humour, but often joined with it, and only when so associated raises any lasting admiration.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gā'tē: wāu: chū'p-mān' nō-pā': lāw: gōd: j'w, i. e. few, 55: a, e, i, &c. mute, 171.

See The compounds found in old authors are Wit-craft, (contrivance, invention); Wit-cracker, (a joker); Wit-snapper, (one who affects repartee); Wit-worm, (a feeder on wit, a canker of wit); &c.

CON-ITR, s. A mineral of a dust colour.

TO CONNOTE, TO CONNOTATE, &c. See in Dict.

Con'-no-ta-tiv', 105: a. That notes something, and, along with it, something more, or in addition. Thus the word man is connotative: for while it notes any one man, it notes his kind, or all that constitutes him a man. Thus again the word white is connotative; for while it notes the quality, white, in any one thing, it notes or implies it in all other white things. On the other hand, John and whiteness are said to be non-connotative; and we may perhaps exemplify the reason given for this by saying, that they are words incapable of being used in predication otherwise than specially: we cannot say, for instance, "This man is John." by virtue of any general knowledge included in the word, but only by virtue of our special accidental knowledge that such is his name: neither can we say of anything, except of whiteness itself, that "it is whiteness;" for the word whiteness is so contrived as to be immediately applicable only to our notion or knowledge of what whiteness is, and not immediately to the white things from which that knowledge has been derived. In thus understanding the distinction sought to be enforced by the term Non-connotative, we may see that it arises entirely out of the scholastic doctrine of predication, and its utility or inutilty must be estimated by the utility or inutilty of that doctrine. Whether, with juster views of the nature of the relation between thought and language, John and whiteness, are not properly deemed connotative as well as man and white, is a point worth inquiry, though it cannot be pursued here.

OBSERVATIONS

PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK. LATIN. AND SCRIPTURE NAMES.

Obs. 1. Greek, Latin, and Hebrew names adopted or made use of in modern speech necessarily acquire, in sound and rhythm, the main characteristics of the language which receives them; and we feel the less scruple in pronouncing with English sounds the written words of those ancient languages, because their original pronunciation has long been lost. The first rule therefore is, when the seat of accent and the syllabication are determined on, to pronounce each syllable according to the usual powers of the letters in English as indicated in the schemes which precede the principles at the beginning of this work. Admitting this rule, the question nevertheless occurs, whether those other tendencies of English pronunciation, which, with regard to our own language, so frequently and so materially interfere with the general rules on which the schemes are founded,—tendencies which required so long a development under the name of principles,—whether these are to have the same influence and effect in modifying the general rule or determining the manner of applying it. That these tendencies do frequently influence our syllabication of classical words, is shown by some remarks contained in Prin. 94:—that the pronunciation of many ancient names which frequently occur is fixed by those tendencies, may be evinced by such examples as Ca'to, Né-ro, Mí-das, So'-lon, Nú-ma; Af'-rica, Peripaté'-ici, which, but for the tendency pointed out by Prin. 92, would, perhaps, have been divided and pronounced Cát'-o, Nér'-o, Míú-us, Sóú-on, Núm'-a; A'-frica, Peripaté'-ici: so Nú'-mator, but for the exception with regard to u noted in the same Prin., would perhaps have been pronounced Núm'-itor; Gal'-bii, Cimné'-rii, Ligú'-ria, but for the tendency stated at Prin. 93, might have been divided into áb'-ii, Cimné'-rii, Ligú'-ria; and Sir'-ius, but for the exception with regard to i, might have been Sí'-rus. Again, but for the tendencies alluded to at Prins. 120 and 92, the diphthongs in Dad'-alus, As'-chyus, would always have been sounded z; and but for the tendency explained at Prin. 147, we never should have heard Phó'-ci-us, Pon'-ti-us. Ma'-ni-a, Ca'-du'-ce-us, &c., pronounced as if written Phó'-shion, Pon'-she-us, &c. It is Walker's principle and practice, that these tendencies, having been allowed to operate thus far, ought to be followed as rules or laws in all correspondent cases; a mode of thinking which is not likely to find many advocates at the present day, and which, it is probable, few persons beside himself have ever entertained in theory, though their practice has unwarily conformed to it.

Obs. 2. In adhering, therefore, generally to Walker's syllabication in the following Key, it is to be understood that we yield to his practice, so far as it appears a general practice, without recognising the validity of his principle further than that general practice is deemed to extend. Hence, some words are found (not a great many) which are not divided into syllables exactly as Walker has, or would have divided them.

Obs. 3. So likewise in adopting the usual mode of sounding ci, si, ti, ce, &c., when without accent before a vowel in the next syllable, it is to be understood that we yield to a practice which has become general, without admitting its propriety; and as the change in the sound of the consonant seems to be a corruption even in our own language, a stand against it is attempted in a few instances, where the capital letters ci, si, &c., which indicate the corrupted sound, are not used.

Obs. 4. Two of the tendencies which interfere with the general rule must however be allowed their effect, almost to the same extent as in pronouncing words purely English. The general principle of the scheme is, that vowel-letters have the same quality of sound when unaccented as when accented; and this is to be understood when no indication to the contrary appears. With regard to a, however, and also with regard to i or its equivalent y, this general principle yields, though not quite so prevalently as in English words, to the tendency which gives to unaccented a the sound ä instead of á, (Prin. 98;) and to unaccented i, or y, the sound ë instead of í. (Prin. 105.) These deviations from the general rule are signified throughout the Key by an Italic character for the a, i, or y; in the absence of which indication, it must be understood that the letter retains its pure sound,—namely, á or í.

Obs. 5. It sometimes happens, after the i or y has yielded to the change of sound indicated in the foregoing observation, that, in the transition to the following vowel, the sound ë acquires something of the nature of a consonant, as we find, for instance, in pronouncing Acha'-i-a, Pompe'-i-us, which in fluent utterance are pronounced Acha'-ya, Pompe'-y-us; (Prin. 146.) A note referring to the present observation accompanies words in which this effect may allowably take place.

Obs. 6. The diphthongs proper or improper, as they are called, are to receive their most usual sounds: thus æ and œ, which are found only in classical words, are sounded ê, (Prin. 103,) except in some instances alluded to in Obs. 1, in which the vowel is customarily shortened; ai when it does not suffer diæresis is to be sounded *â (Prin. 100;); aw is sounded âw, (Prin. 123;); eu and œ (the latter scarcely occurs) are sounded û, (Prin. 110;); oi is sounded as in toil, boy, (Prin. 29.) There is only one of the digraphs—namely, ei—that does not take its most usual sound; for the proper sound of ei in the majority of English words is ê, (Prin. 103,) but in classical names it is sounded î.

Obs. 7. C and g before e, (and consequently æ, œ), i, and y, must, according to the general rule, have their soft sounds, which it is not necessary to indicate by any particular mark when the letters come together; but when the consonant, by the syllabication, happens to be separated from the vowel, the soft sound of the c or g is signified by the Italic character: on the other hand, when g, notwithstanding its position before e, i, or y, is pronounced hard, as is customary in some Hebrew and Greek names, it is printed in a small capital, or if at the beginning of a word, in a larger capital than usual.

Obs. 8. Ch in Greek words is always sounded h, (Prin. 161,) and in Scripture names also, though not without one or two exceptions. Such is the sound it must receive wherever the letters are in the ordinary character; but being printed in small capitals, or in larger capitals than usual at the beginning of a word, the sound is to be that of the English ch as in chair, each. As to ph it is to have the same sound in proper names as in all other adopted words from the ancient languages.—namely, f, (Prin. 163.) Other combinations of initial consonants which are foreign to the nature and habits of our language, drop the sound of their first letters; as Cn, Ci, Gn, Mn, Pn, Ps, Pt, Phth, Tm. (Prin. 144.)

Obs. 9. What is chiefly attended to and chiefly sought after in the pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture names, is the seat of the accent. This (with a very few exceptions in Scripture names) is always on the last syllable but one, or the last but two. As to Latin, the law is, that if by the usage of the ancient poets the penultimate is long, it is to have the accent; but if short, then the accent goes to the previous syllable. With regard to Greek, the law is originally something different, but in our modern pronunciation of Greek we follow the Latin rule. As to Hebrew, the original seat of accent is almost every word a matter of doubt or controversy, to escape from which the usual course is to receive the words through the Greek of the Septuagint, and so to accent them as Greek words by the Latin law. Such are the general principles by which the place of the accent in Greek, Latin, and Scripture names is determined. But in bringing them to bear on particular instances, the greatest difficulties frequently occur. In the first place, it is often impossible to determine the quantity of the penultimate even in Greek and Latin names; because the word occurs perhaps only in the prose-writers, or belongs, as it does in many instances, to the bastard or monkish Latin of the middle ages; while, with regard to Scripture names, there is, as above stated, scarcely any guide but the Septuagint, and even this affords no clew to the quantity of the penultimate if it happens not to be a diphthong, nor an e nor an o, nor a vowel before two consonants. Added to all this, the poets themselves do not always agree; and the same word as it comes to us from the Greek through the Latin, or directly from the Greek, sometimes has a different accentuation. (See Prin. 86.) To mark the seat of accent in every instance, in a manner to preclude all doubt or difference of opinion, is therefore impossible. It is sufficient to have the support of good authorities when they can be found, and to abide by reputable custom when they cannot. The greatest industry, considerable research, and much acquired tact as regards custom, seem to have been employed by Walker in making up his mind in doubtful cases; and the accentuation which he adopts is followed with very few exceptions in the ensuing pages.

Obs. 10. Only one more remark needs be made: whatever was the nature or the manner of ancient accent, in bringing the words which were subject to it into the texture of English speech, its nature or manner must become English. (See Prin. 174.) And as, in our own language, when a word is of some length, we assist the principal by a secondary accent or accents, so in Greek, Latin, and Scripture names, the same practice prevails. Accordingly, in the following Key, whenever the rhythm requires a secondary accent to assist the principal, the seat of both is marked,—that of the secondary accent by the single stroke ('), that of the principal accent by the double stroke ('').

* In Hebrew words some speakers choose to give ai the diphthongal pronunciation âê; but the practice is far from being common or established.

(a) Letter s in some situations is liable to be sounded s: see Pr. 151.

(b) It is usual to vocalize the s: or if s take the corrupted sound, to make it z the instead of sh.

(c) This is an English formative.

(d) See also, or words related to it, in the Dictionary.

(e) This is the classical accent, but improper in any reference to the modern city.

(f) Thus in Scripture, and in naming the modern city.

(g) Alexia is equivalent to A-leck'-si-a, Alexio to A-leck'-si-o and Amaxia to A-mack'-si-a.

(h) This is Walker's pronunciation on the principle that it is an English formative from the previous word, but the common pronunciation is A-mal'-e-kites

A, a, or ah=d: i or y=e: es=ez: ch=k: ci, si, ti, &c.=she: (") the principal accent.

(a) Letter s in some situations is liable to be sounded s; see Ir. 151.

(b) It is usual to vocalize the i; or if s take the corrupted sound, to make it zhe instead of she.

(c) This is an English formative.

(d) See also, or words related to it, in the Dictionary.

(e) The city of Assyria celebrated for the decisive battle between Alexander and Darius; and also a city of Palestine.

(f) A town of Sicily.

(g) A king of Sparta.

(h) A name occurring in Scripture.

(i) The g, however inconsistently, is usually made hard; see also.

the English formative in the Dictionary.

(k) The letters ch are sounded as apha^o-eic a.

(l) The former x=gz, the latter, ks; see Irin 154.

(m) This is equivalent to Ar-tack^o-i-as.

(a) Letter s in some situations is liable to be sounded z:

see Pr. 151.

(b) It is usual to vocalize the s; or if s take the corrupted sound, to make it zhe instead of she.

(c) This is an English formative.

(d) See also, or words related to it, in the Dictionary.

(e) Shakespeare reduces it to two syllables.

(f) The weeping philosopher, often mentioned with Democritus, the laughing philosopher, and hence often wrongly accented on the antecedent syllable.

(g) In English He'-si-od, with a vocalized.

(h) This may be found in English writers incorrectly in three syllables.

(i) In English He'-mer.

(k) In English He'-mer.

(l) In English He'-mer.

(b) It is usual to vocalize the s; or if it take the corrupted sound, to pronounce it z instead of s.

(s) This is an English formative.

(d) See also, or words related to it, in the Dictionary.

(e) The English pronunciation is Hy-pe'-ri-a and Hy-pe'-ri-on as in Shakespeare and other of our poets.

(f) This is accented according to Milton.

(g) Our elder English writers pronounce it Iph'-i-gi'-ni-a.

(h) The latter syllables blend into one.

(b) It is usual to vocalize the s; or if s take the corrupted sound, to make it the instead of the.

(c) This is an English formative.

(d) See also, or words related to it, in the Dictionary.

(e) This is an English formative, and the u is sounded as in /ull.

(f) This is at present the universal pronunciation of this word, though the authorities give Sam'-a-i'-a as having been likewise in use.

(g) The p in the first syllable is absorbed by the sound of ph in the second; see Trin. 142: Sapphire is an English formative which see also in the Dictionary.

(h) The original quantity of the first syllable is short, and the word might accordingly be pronounced Sa'-ni; but, as in a thousand other instances, (such as Ca'-to, Pla'-to, &c.) the epi-labication in the English mode of sounding the word causes the first vowel to finish the syllable: see the word also in the Dictionary.

APPENDIX

ON THE PRONUNCIATION OF MODERN FOREIGN NAMES IN ENGLISH DISCOURSE

THE DICTIONARY, beside the pronunciation of purely English words, gives that of such foreign terms as are partially naturalized;—ancient proper names have their pronunciation indicated in the previous KEY;—and in this very brief APPENDIX, in order to complete the purpose of the whole work, some suggestions will be offered as to the manner of pronouncing modern names of places and persons, which, from their foreign or unusual spelling, may seem difficult to be brought into the oral texture of our language.

In all languages, proper names are subject, much more than common names, to a corrupt or idiomatic pronunciation. This may be seen, with regard to OUR OWN LANGUAGE, by a few examples given in a note (167) at page xxxiv of the PRINCIPLES. Such a pronunciation evidently belongs only to the circle in which the persons or places are well known, and would in most instances not be proper out of it, nor be fit for adoption when brought among the subjects of discourse in a foreign language. So with regard to foreign names used in our language, any attempts at idiomatic accuracy would not only in most instances be without success, but, even if successful, would be improper; for our object is to be understood by English people, and a pronunciation fitted for English ears is therefore indispensable; though, on the other hand, it ought not to be so entirely English as to remove every trace of nationality.

With regard to proper names in ANGLO-AMERICAN usage, there does not seem to be any peculiar nationality requiring attention in an English speaker. The following, and many like them, however transatlantic as whole words, are yet pronounced with English sounds, and to their component syllables:—for instance, Mon-nec'-ti-cut; Ken-tuc'-ky; Mas'-sa-chus'-s-etts; (ch as tch;) Mis'-sis-sip'-pi; Ni-ag'-ra-falls; Chi'-go; Pis-cat'-away; Sus'-que-han'-nah; &c., in which we have only to give the natural powers to the letters, and the words will be justly sounded. With regard to the seat of accent there is much diversity of practice among the Americans, as there is among ourselves, except in the district of each place respectively; and an English speaker cannot be quite wrong who places the accent where it seems most naturally to fall.

Our mode of proceeding with respect to the CELTIC DIALECTS that we meet with at home, will confirm the general principle suggested for the pronunciation of all foreign names. It is evident from their various aspect to the eye, that GAELIC, ERSE, WELSH, and CORNISH names have their peculiar characteristics, and if we go to the places we shall generally find a peculiar characteristic pronunciation; but this pronunciation is improper for general use. The Celtic aspiration with which Loch or Lough terminates is properly changed by us into k. There is no peculiar difficulty in such names as For'-res; Mon-trose'; Kir-ka'-dy; In'-ver-loch'-y; (ch as k;) In'-ner-ky'-then, Clac-man'-nan; Dun-sin'-nane; though the different accent which Shakspeare gives to this last word,—namely, Dun'-siu-nane, is a proof that a fixed seat of accent must not always be looked for. Even family names are often pronounced differently in Scotland and in England: thus, they say For'-bes in the former, but in England we pronounce it in one syllable. The Hebrews we pronounce as a Latin word. Crossing the channel, there will be very little to say on the pronunciation of IRISH names. The letters gh after a vowel are always silent in our mode of sounding; as in Ar'-magh, Fer-man'-agh, and the family name Ke-ogh; while in other situations the g only is sounded; as in Mon'-aghan, Don'-na-ghue. The accent often tends to the last syllable in Irish names, as in Ty-rone', Con-naught'; but this tendency yields to our own habits when the words become familiar; as for instance the last word, which in English use has shifted its accent to the first syllable. Returning to the British shore, it is only necessary to say of WELSH names, that Ll go with us only for a single l, and that w, occupying a situation where it must be sounded as a vowel, is equivalent to u or oo. The CORNISH names are frequently of some length, as Per'-a-mar'-wo-thal; and, being shorter, often have their accent on the last syllable, as Pen-zance'; but they offer nothing further for remark.

* Goldsmith (Traveller) accents the penultimate.

Our next observations may be applied to those languages whose original stock is Latin, — namely, ITALIAN, SPANISH, PORTUGUESE, and FRENCH. But, for almost all that is necessary to be said on these, the inspector is referred to 170, (page xxxv.) among the principles prefixed to the Dictionary. Universally it may be laid down as a rule, that the sounds of the single vowels in all languages but English, are 1, \hat{a} ; 2, \bar{a} , (viz. e ;) 3, \bar{e} , (viz. i ;) 4, \bar{o} ; and 5, \bar{u} , (viz. u .) There are modifications of these, and particularly in French, as is pointed out in the instructions furnished in the Principles; (Prin. 170;) but an adherence to the rule, generally, will be sufficient for all common purposes. With respect to the consonants, their sound (still speaking generally) is the same in all European languages, and little hazard will be incurred by adhering in this respect to English custom. Among the exceptions is the th, which on the continent is usually sounded as t simply: thus the French family name Berthollet, is sounded Bare'-tol-lay'. X is often sounded as s or ç, as in Aix-la-Chapelle, (ace'-la-sha-pe'l'.) The French nasal sound of n, it is sometimes proper to retain, as in Nantes, (nongt), the Simplon, (sang'-plong;) and sometimes to sink, as in Ly'-ons, Or'-leans; which two words and many others easily receive a purely English pronunciation. It must be confessed that this point is very doubtful, as in the word Ghent, which some call gongt, and others (less affected in their habits) pronounce Guënt. Similar remarks apply to Caen, (the place in Normandy,) which some call Cång, and others Cå'-ën. The last syllable in Elbow has its diphthong sounded with a medium between the English u in buff and the oo in roof. In La Saone (the river) the ao have the sound of long o, and so have the eaus in Bordeaux; while in Bruxelles (Brussels) the x is sounded as s. In Boulogne the concluding sounds are those of oin, with a sound as of y consonant added. With regard to Italian words they are for the most part susceptible of an English pronunciation, — Med'-i-ci, and A-jac'-cio, (a-jas'-se-o;) for instance, are as properly pronounced with the English sounds of the consonants (not the vowels) as in the Italian way Med'-e-che, and A-yatch'-o. In Ben'-ti-vo'-gli-o (-völ'-yó) the g is silent, as it is in similar situations elsewhere: in Mach'-ia-vel'-li, the h keeps the chard, as it does the g in Malpi'-ghi, (-pe'-ghe;) in Giucciardini (gwitch'-ar-de'-ne) the u is sounded as in langud. These few hints, and a recollection that for the most part Italian words are accented on the penultimate, will be sufficient; and they may be extended without much danger of error to Spanish and Portuguese names, whether prevalent in the peninsula or in the kingdoms and republics of South America. Most of the Spanish names of places have been adapted to English speech by an English orthography; and the vowels fall in situations in which they can hardly fail to have proper sounds. The u in Pam'-pelu'-na, Es'-tremadu'-a, is pronounced \bar{u} almost without an effort; Al'-bu-querque, (al'-boo-ker) Zu'-ma-la-car'-re-gui, offer no greater difficulty than we meet with in some English words; and the same may be observed Cien'-fue'-gos, (se'-en-fwe'-gos;) Cav'-aniles; Bad'-a-jos; Buenos-Ayres, (boüen'-os-ä-rës;) Ri'-o-Ja-nei'-ro, (rë'-ó-jä-näi'-rô;) Gua'-na, (gwë'-äh'-näi;) Chi'li (the ch sounded in Chili;) and Qui'-to, (kë'-tô.)

The Teutonic languages have, like our own, a Gothic parentage, and to the present day have, with ours, an equal relationship to Icelandic, which is the living representative of the common parent. It might be thought, therefore, that we ought to find little difficulty in pronouncing German names, which have, however, a formidable appearance to the eye from the number of consonants that frequently seem uncombinable. But many of these combinations have single sounds, as sch, a trigraph merely equivalent to sh in English; while others, if the combination is difficult, one of the sounds may be dropped, or may fall into its kindred sound, as f into v, s into z, and the like. Ch in German has various sounds, but one of these is k, and, except in combination with s just referred to, it may always have this sound, — namely, k, when German names are pronounced in English. H is an aspirate as in English at the beginning of words; but after a vowel it is mute, serving however to lengthen the vowel, an office which we likewise assign to it in a few cases in English. In German they sound W as V, and J as Y; which ought not to be done in the English pronunciation of names, because it would quite obscure them, making them to us one thing to the eye, and another to the ear. G may always be sounded hard. As to the vowels, when they stand singly, they should have the sounds which, as already stated, prevail generally on the continent. Of the diphthongs au should be sounded as our English ow; ei as i; and ie as e: oe must have a sound difficult to be explained on paper; but it may be conceived in the name Goethe, by supposing Gur'-et-tay pronounced in two syllables without any sound of the r, which is inserted merely to keep the u in the sound we are accustomed to give it when short before a consonant; thus managed, the sound in the first syllable will be nearly the same as in the French word feu. The seat of the accent varies in German words as in English, but it goes with less caprice to the radical syllable, which a sort of instinct will mostly point out to an Englishman. After these remarks, it will not be difficult to bring into English speech such names as Wielund, (wë'-land;) Mosheim, (mös'-him;) Gesner, (Guës'-ner;) Schwartzenburg, (shwartz'-en-burg;) Lichtenstein, (lick'-tën-stëin;) Sonderhausen, (sön'-der-how'-sn;) Stahl, (stä) Hohenlohe, (hö'-hën-lö'-të;) &c.

Druid names come under the general scope of the foregoing remarks, though with some little differences, as may be observed in Druid, (dë'-röö'-ter;) Zuy-der-zee, (zoo'-d soe"); Helvoet-sluis, (hèl'-vèd-slūs"); Dor-drécht, (dor'-drécht, generally contracted to dort;) &c.

Danish, Swedish, and Norwegian continue to present the general characteristics of this family of languages; as may be instanced by such names as Aarhuys, (ar'-hoos); Sukm, (sūm); Niebuhr, (nē'-boor); Schimmelmänn, (shīm'-mēl-mān); Maclaurin, (the a as in father); Ta-vas'chus, (ch hard); Trol-hæl'-ta; Klin'-genst-ier'-na, (g hard, and the i in the penultimate liquid or like y); &c.

The other languages of the North and North-eastern parts of Europe are of the Slavonic stock, and the Russians boast that theirs is an improved dialect. Their alphabet contains thirty-four letters, comprising in the number the Greek characters, though much altered in form. These letters, so different from those used by the other nations of Europe, when they come to be denoted by signs deemed equivalent, give rise to considerable diversities of spelling. Thus for Basili-des, we have Basil'ovitch, and Basil'owitz; and for the name of Catherine's general, the devastator of Poland, we have Souvor'off, Suwar'roff, and Suwar'row. The fact is, we generally get Russian names through the medium of the Germans, who spell them for their own pronunciation. Hence, with respect to Russian names, the hints for German names may suffice, except that the ck, which we may allowably make hard in the latter, should be heard as the English ch in Russian names; for instance in Chick'agoff, which sound will not be different if a r precede, as in Tcher'ni-goff. After these remarks, perhaps such names as the following may be sounded without much difficulty; Vlad'-i-mir; Vor'-on-etsch, (the last syllable as we pronounce etch); Yar'-o-slaf; Dol'-go-ruc'-ki, (the penultimate syllable as we sound rook); Mil'-or-ad'-o-witz, or Mil'-or-ad'-o-vitch; the first form being through the German, the latter more immediately from the Russ.*

Concerning EASTERN names we need only observe, that they are prone to an ultimate accent; as Nag'-poor', Ber'-han-poor'; Tan-jote, Ban'-ga-lore'; Se-ring'-a-pa-tam', Ma-su-li-pa-tam'; Hy'-dra-bad', Au-rung'-a-bad'; so likewise the Persian province Cho'-ra-zan'. Other words need have nothing in their accent or the sounds of their syllables new to an English mouth, although un-English in their whole character; as Trich'-i-nop'-o-ly, Bar'-am-poo'-ter, Him'-a-lay'-a. With respect to Chinese names, it must be remembered, that they who first put them into European characters had a view to the continental languages of our part of the world; and the letter i which so often occurs was meant for the sound ē. The name of the emperor who received Lord Macartney, which is written Kien Long by others, was spelled Chen Lung by those attached to the English embassy. In either case, a pronunciation accurately corresponding with the original is not to be expected; nor can it be expected in other names; such as Hang'-hi; Chi-Hoang'-ti; Tsong-tching'; Li'-cong'-tse; Ku'-hing.

* These are given as anglicised modes of sounding the names. A Russian lays the accent, in many of the examples, on the penultimate syllable instead of the antepenultimate, where English habits incline to place it.
